For schools to provide the quality education children deserve, families, schools, and communities must be involved as purposeful partners in the education process.

Teaching for Change developed the Tellin' Stories approach to engage families and staff. It uses the power of story to connect people from diverse backgrounds, to pass on valuable information and experiences, and to organize collective action. The most gratifying aspect of this work is that parents, educators, community members, and partner organizations are redefining the vision of school communities by helping those who are traditionally excluded from the decision-making process become a central part of it.

Please check www.crec.org for any weather delay or cancellation notices.

Allyson Criner Brown is the associate director of Teaching for Change and leads the Tellin' Stories parent empowerment project, recognized by the U.S. Department of Education and the Harvard Family Research Project as a leading innovation in family engagement. A former middle school teacher, Allyson holds a master's degree in public administration from The George Washington University and is driven by her experiences in schools and community-based nonprofits that focus on education, youth development, and social justice.
